Mówilem: Narodziny Skalic Wp.Wednesday, October 22, 2011 I know I have mentioned several times in the past that I will be participating in the blog hop with the Australian Children's Book Council. Unfortunately I am having to delay these posts because my kids' Autumn visits mean I am out of school (for now) and very busy with the many things they do here. Paging systems use a network to transmit messages to a select group of people (e.g., paging devices). Typically, a paging device is held by the user, and is usually a hand-held, battery operated device. When a paging device is in a user's possession, the paging device may be activated to receive a message (e.g., page). The paging device may then generate a message indicator (e.g., a sound or vibration), and cause the paging device to transmit the message to a network. The message may then be transmitted over an air interface to a destination device, which is capable of receiving the message. The destination device may then generate a message indicator, and provide the destination address (e.g., a telephone number) to the network. The network may then transmit the destination address to the paging device. The paging device may then transmit the message to the destination device. After receiving the message, the destination device may be capable of generating a message indicator and playing the message to the user. Prior art paging systems typically include various types of user controls to enable the paging device to be operated. For example, the paging device may include buttons or switches on the paging device to enable the paging device to be switched on and off, to wake or sleep the paging device, to receive or not receive a message, etc. Additionally, the paging device may include an alphanumeric display for displaying messages. However, in the event that a message is received in the middle of the night, the user may have difficulty viewing the display of the paging 82138339de
