Rodman has been unproductive. No, I don't think he's had a bad game. I think he has shown he isn't going to be a beast in the interior, but he's not the shell/sideline shutdown defender with any amount of reliability he had as a rookie or second year player in college. He's had a few games where he's been fantastic, but as a rookie he couldn't find the proper balance of being able to handle the physical nature of an NBA game as well as the soft spot. You can't be that guy in your rookie season if you have to work hard for every single play and it doesn't come naturally. That's just the nature of the beast as a rookie and a sophomore. I'm not so sure the defensive ability of his game has really been able to improve much in 2 years. He's a sophomore playing a lot of minutes and shooting is what has improved his production the most so far. I don't think last year was a fluke as far as his defense goes. There are still plenty of ways to get better defensively but I don't think the foundation has been set for him to compete against guys like LeBron. "I don't think that was a cyst...it looked like a long, thin, worm like creature slithering out from my left nostril and up along the right side of my face." -- E. Coyote Don't really care too much for college players right now, just hope they can translate some of it to the NBA. If Rodman was such a beast as a rookie, how did he make such a drastic improvement in 2 seasons? I mean I don't know if his skillsets really translated to the NBA game or not, and he would certainly have to improve offensively but I don't know if he's really able to do that as well as he was at UNC.
