An application of the exclusion technique in the quantification of iron in blood. An exclusion technique for the quantification of iron in biological samples has been evaluated. A volume of blood containing known amounts of iron is caused to contact a test strip of paper and allowed to dry. The amount of iron in the sample retained on the paper is determined by comparing the intensity of reflection of light by the sample, under certain conditions, with that of a known amount of iron. Blood hematocrit and total iron binding protein concentration were determined in the same samples used in the iron determinations. In vitro determination of iron in blood samples from patients with various hemoglobins was in agreement with conventional methods. Iron, but not total iron binding protein concentration, showed a positive correlation with hemoglobin concentration. However, blood samples from anemic and nonanemic patients showed similar iron concentrations.
