analysis 4th edition ISBN 978-0-27-376068-9 | 97800-27-376068-9. Demand for the electronics market as a consequence of the increasing penetration of information and communication technologies in national economies, and the reshaping of the world market by major players, such as Microsoft and Intel, is the topic of this textbook. Computer technology has had a significant impact on all economic functions, and today this impact extends to the field of economics itself.
Business and industry are adapting to the new technologies and have recently undergone a period of "computing transformation" that will have far-reaching consequences. The book presents the theory and methods necessary for using computers to increase efficiency and to optimize manufacturing processes. It describes the variety of applications of computers to economic analysis. In chapters dedicated to the study of inventory, demand-and-supply analysis, financial modelling and accounting, and decision-making, the practical side of economics is described, using examples based on actual IBM and Packard Bell computers. The book discusses demand functions and types of demand with special emphasis on the econometric analysis of data and the relationship between consumer and producer behaviour. The focus on the international dimension, both of economics and of business, is illustrated by examples from the world market. A chapter describes the global impact of computers as an information resource and economic tool and discusses the implications of the World Wide Web. An appendix provides a selection of computer programs, allowing readers to practice the methods presented in the book. /r/e_e_st: Matematiskt
