Raster imaging is, by definition, pixel-based, meaning you're relying on the number of pixels to represent what you're looking at — think film, or the web. Pixel maps use an RGB palette to lay out the colours of any image, and as a result, they can be quite confusing in that they create a 2D tracery of your pixels. Photoshop, however, has always used Layers to lay out your image, making it infinitely easier to change the way your image looks, blending images together, cropping, managing your colours, and so on. To draw from another image, simply duplicate an image layer. If you need it to do something else, such as to soften a hard edge, bring a layer to the front, and then use the Eraser tool in its Layers panel, you'll find that you're lost in Photoshop's world of pixel-based thinking.
